A study of Mermaids; legendary aquatic creatures with the upper body of a female human and the tail of a fish.

The word 'mermaid' is a compound of the English mere (sea) and maid (a girl or a young woman). The equivalent term in Old English was merwif.

similar skeleton structure to the normal human body. Only changes from the waist down.

They are conventionally depicted as beautiful with long flowing hair. Mermaids are sometimes associated with perilous events such as floods, storms, shipwrecks and drownings.

Dangerous.

Extremely strong and can simply grab their victim and pull them underwater.

In Greek mythology, the Sirens were dangerous creatures who lured sailors with their enchanting music and singing voices to shipwreck on the rocky coast of their island. Roman poets placed them on some small islands called Sirenium scopuli. According to the Greek Neoplatonist philosopher Proclus said there were three kinds of sirens: the celestial, the generative, and the purgatory/cathartic. The first were under the government of Zeus, the second under that of Poseidon, and the third of Hades.

When the soul is in heaven the sirens seek, by harmonic motion, to unite it to the divine life of the celestial host; and when in Hades, to conform the soul to eternal infernal regimen; but when on earth their only job to produce generation, of which the sea is emblematic?

They swim much more swiftly than an equine human being and also to effectively pierce the vital parts of their victims.

Mermaids exhibit physical strength which is higher than that of a normal human woman. They use this strength and speed for actions like ensnaring the throats of their victims.

Physical appearance: Their skin is usually steely grey, not slick like their scales but looks more rubbery. Looks a bit like a dolphin. Sharp fins for better mobility and faster swimming in the water.

There are two different types of skeletal: the exo-skeleton, which is the stable outer shell of an organism, and the endoskeleton, which forms the support structure inside the body. The skeleton of the fish is made of either cartilage or bone. The main features of the fish, the fins, are bony fin rays and, except for the dorsal fin, have no direct connection with the spine. They are supported only by muscles.

The skeleton of the paired fins is formed from many small bones, called fin rays, in a fin-like arrangement, which are supported at the bases of the fins by parallel rows of bones, called fin-rays (radials). All living actinopterygians except bichthys and reeffishes also have branching rays in unpaired fins.

Fins are usually the most distinctive anatomical features of a fish. They are composed of bony spines or rays protruding from the body with skin covering them and joining them together, either in a webbed fashion, as seen in most bony fish, or similar to a flipper, as seen in sharks.

Male equivalent of the mermaid is the merman, also a familiar figure in folklore and heraldry.

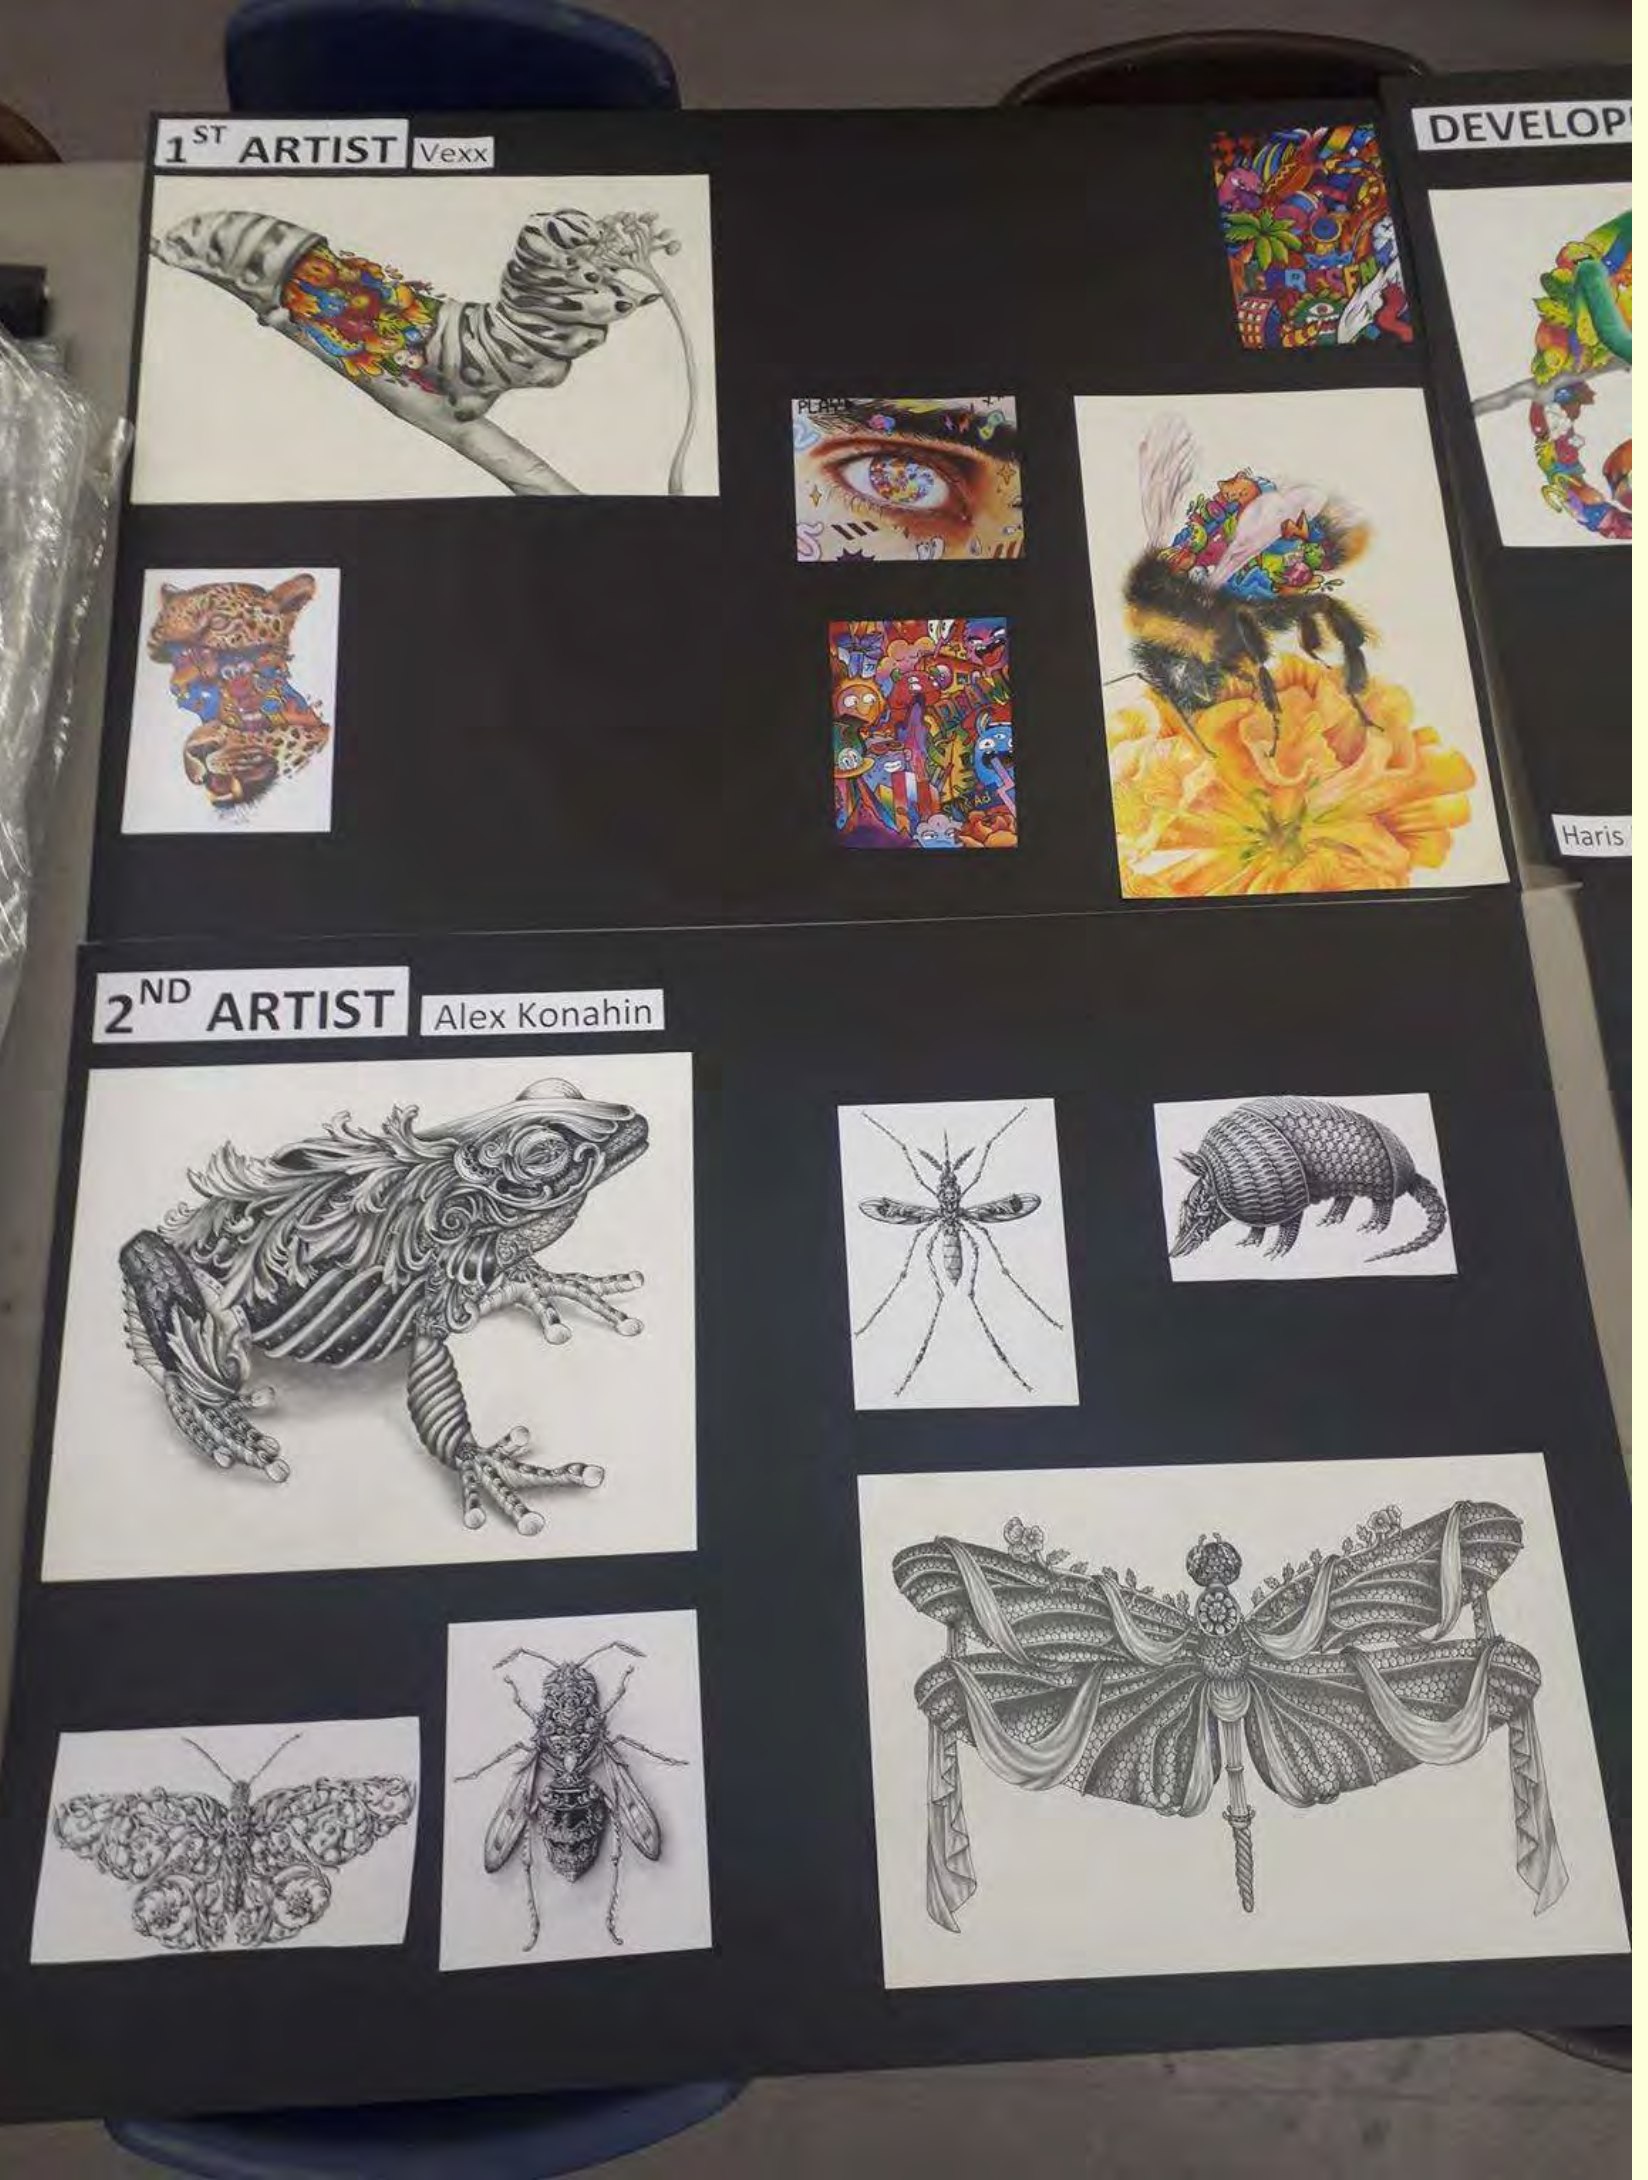

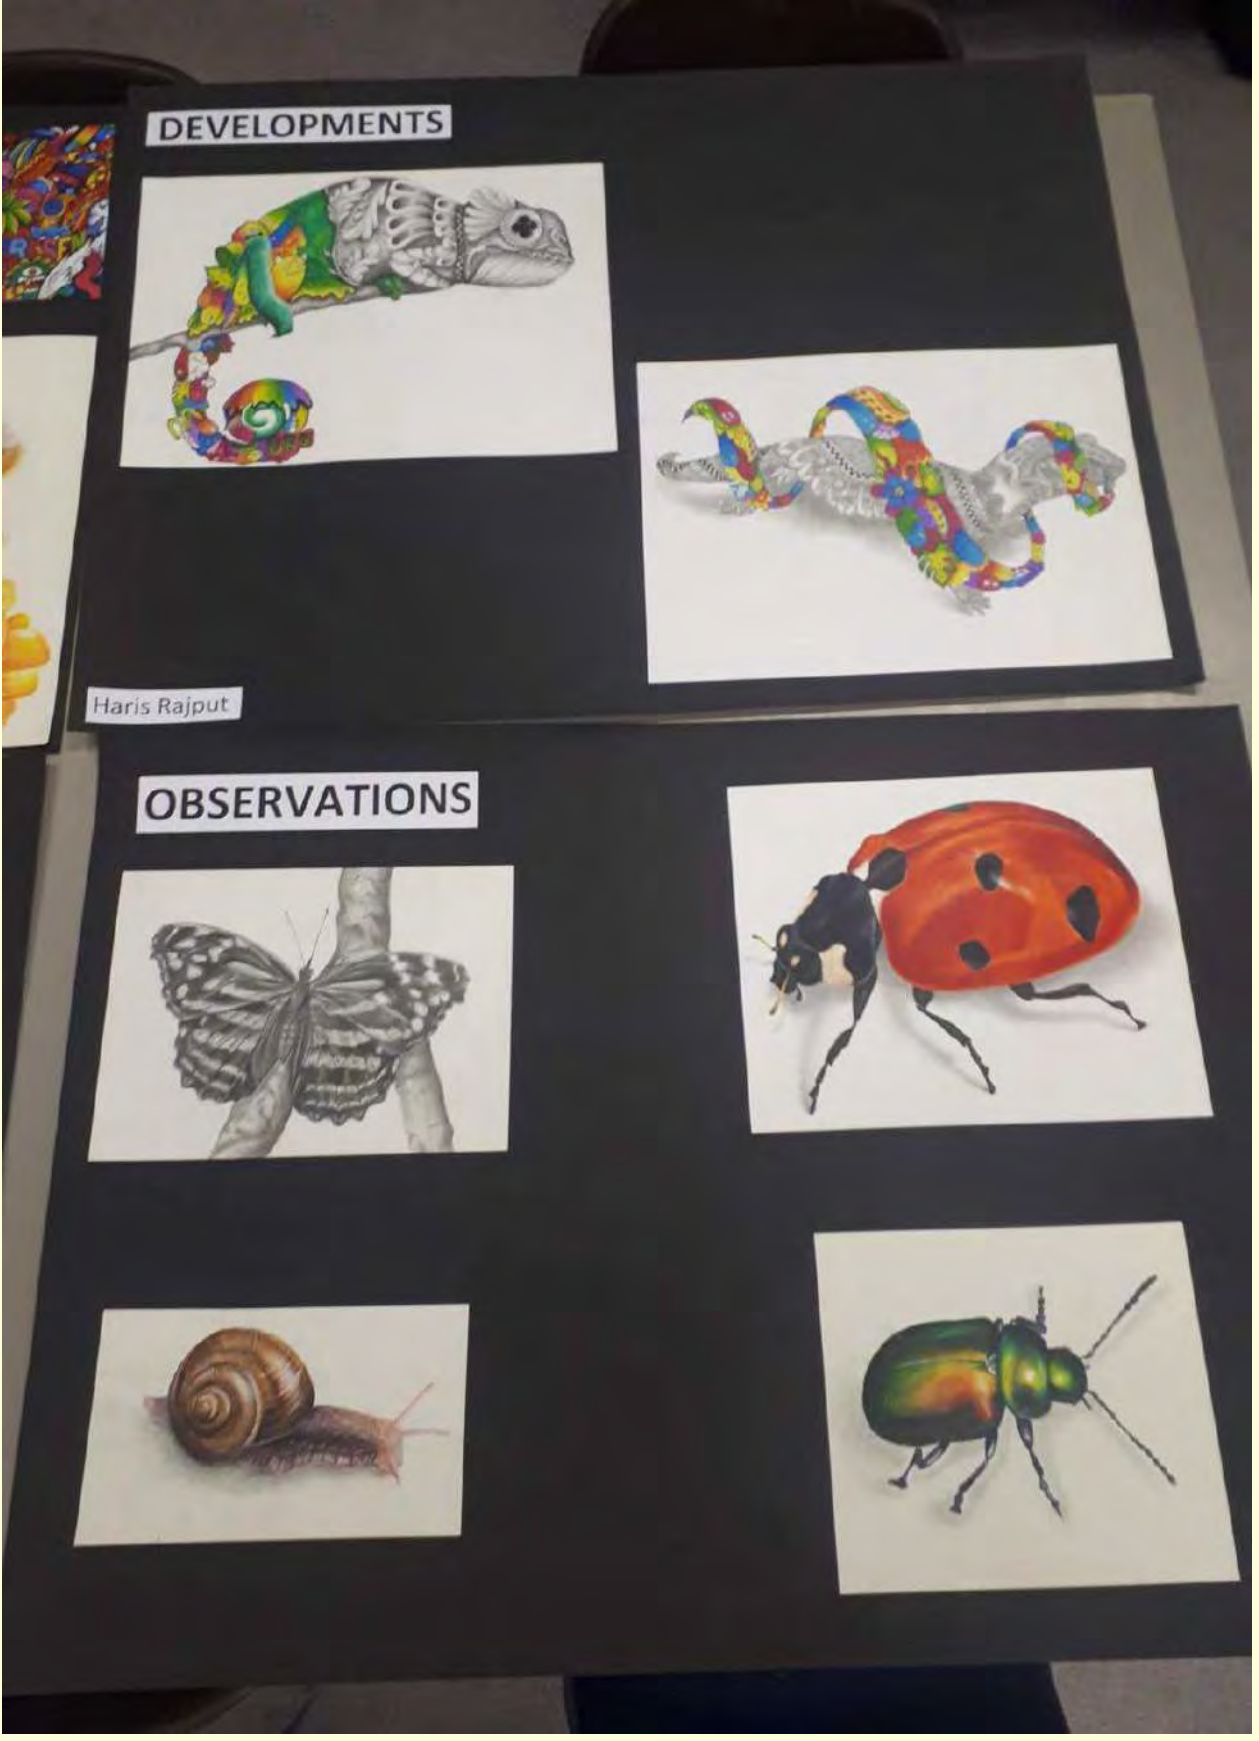

dangerous, these mermaids will do anything to protect their home in Whitecap Bay.

where mermaids have been known to gather for hundreds of years, thereby striking terror in the heart of sailors and pirates alike.

Drawn to the surface by a single sailor, they entrance them before dragging them to the depths of the Bay to devour them.
